

Allie Moore

IMC 361 MWF

Let us all go back to early March 2020. If you can remember to what seems like forever ago, times were normal. In Oxford, the cold winter air was getting warmer, and, most importantly, Swayze field was rocking.

Ole Miss baseball began their regular season in February 2020. Even though the Rebels lost their first game, they continuously won every single game after that.

The LSU series was coming up when the coronavirus erupted. This series would have been a true test for Ole Miss baseball since LSU is a solid baseball program, and it was their first SEC series.

As this outbreak started to unfold, Ole Miss baseball's 2020 season came to an end. The momentum of a 16-game win streak had to come to a complete stop. Mike Clement, the hitting coach, says that they were left with a question mark.

Usually, when you are coming to an end of your season, the only way for the season to end is for you to lose. So, Ole Miss winning and having their season ending does, in fact, leave them with a question mark.

How do you handle this question mark that has no answers?

The response is hard. These college players who respect their coaches looked to them for the answer. In the best ways that they could, the coaches responded. Even though there were not many answers and no practices, there were weekly zoom meetings to check-in on players.

Since the rest of the spring and summer was absent, it makes you ask: where is Ole Miss baseball at right now?

Well, luckily, baseball is back on the field. A successful fall ball has just come to an end, and they prepare for their annual Omaha Challenge.

The full details of how the 2021 season will go is still up in the air. Hopefully, in spring 2021, the Ole Miss baseball team can pick up right where they left off. Allowing them to turn that question mark into an exclamation point.